„The time to act on sepsis is now. I encourage EU Member States to strengthen efforts to prevent infections that can lead to sepsis and thus save lives. The appropriate use of antimicrobials is vital to maintain our ability to effectively treat sepsis: I call on all Member States to put in place national AMR action plans and to improve the quality of life of sepsis survivors“.

Objectives and Expected Results

To highlight the human and economic burden of sepsis

Each year in Europe, more than 3.4 million individuals develop sepsis. 700,000 do not survive, and an additional one-third of survivors die during the following year. Many survivors face life-long consequences, such as new physical, mental, and cognitive problems.

To point out that most sepsis deaths and impairments are preventable

Sepsis is the most preventable cause of death or disability. It may be prevented by reducing infections, including through vaccination, by early recognition, and by ensuring that sepsis is treated as an emergency.

To foster the implementation of the requests of the WHO resolution on sepsis across the European Union

The 2017 WHO Resolution “Improving Prevention, Diagnosis and Clinical Management of Sepsis“ urges UN Member States to develop national strategies to increase public awareness and implement training for all healthcare professionals on infection prevention and the early recognition and management of sepsis.

The development and implementation of a Pan-European sepsis strategy

Bringing together all stakeholders, including patients and their families, with the aim to increase understanding that improvement of early recognition and appropriate management of sepsis must become the keystone of the Pan-European infection management strategy.

To achieve these objectives, we will launch the European Sepsis Alliance (ESA).
